When we cross mid-life, we want our second half to be better than our first. Some of us have succeeded in career at the expense of their marriage and family. We have climbed up the ladder of achievement only to find it leaning against the wrong wall.

Others have found professional fulfillment but feel there is more. Life is more than acquiring material things and satisfying personal needs. We want to do something significant and leave behind a lasting legacy.

No matter how we have started and where we are now, we want to finish well. And we need to start now. The seminar will help us write a personal definition of finishing well, appropriate important principles, and work on action steps to set us on track to finishing well.
